When Supports Say 'No': The Crisis of Exclusion in Profound Autism

By: Dr. Amanda Kelly

For many learners with significant support needs, attempting to access supports and services outside of Firefly comes with an enormous amount of fear and uncertainty. We often hear about learners being removed from day treatment or alternative activity programs, and/or an inability to find any suitable residential or day treatment care. The reality is that levels of ability and behaviors can create significant barriers to accessing needed care and supports. The Profound Autism Alliance recently conducted a nationwide caregiver survey and found that 80% of individuals with profound autism have been outright denied the opportunity to participate in community programs because of their support needs, with 63% asked to leave a program due to behaviors and 69% denied access to healthcare, respite or school. Behind every statistic is a family fighting for care.

In most cases, it's not a lack of willingness that keeps organizations from accepting individuals. The reality of limited staff, inadequate space and resources, and insufficient training make it difficult to provide the level of support our most vulnerable community members need. On top of that, there are no financial incentives to include them, and the costs of care increase significantly as support needs rise. Ensuring continued education regarding the complexities of significant support needs is key.

Firefly Autism's Training and Consultation program hopes to offer solutions. The program focuses on developing train-the-trainer systems and a consultative support model that can be implemented internally. This approach helps establish an independent support infrastructure, promoting the long-term self-sufficiency of the inclusion model and reducing the need for full-time consultants or new staff. By empowering internal team members with the right skills and knowledge, the program ensures that these models can operate efficiently and effectively, minimizing reliance on external resources over time.

The crisis of exclusion for individuals with significant support needs will not be solved overnight, but we can make meaningful progress with intentional strategies and collaboration.

Firefly Success Stories

A Heartwarming Moment in the Grocery Store

During a recent grocery shopping trip, one of our Transition to Work learners experienced a special connection. After finishing his shopping, his staff member signed “ready?” to him. At that moment, a woman who is deaf noticed and approached them. She pointed to the learner's cochlear implant and asked—using American Sign Language (ASL) along with her voice—if they knew sign language.

The staff member explained that the learner is deaf and that she was his behavior technician, though she only knew a little ASL herself. She encouraged the learner to introduce himself in sign. The woman smiled, introduced herself back, and told him it was nice to meet him.

Later, the staff explained to the learner that he had just met someone else who is deaf. With a big smile, he shared that the encounter made him feel happy.

Moments like this remind us of the power of community, connection, and belonging.

Get Involved

Every person deserves the chance to thrive—and at Firefly, we're committed to making that possible through donor support. Many of our learners face up to a $2,000 monthly gap between the cost of care and what insurance covers. Thanks to generous donors, children who arrived nonverbal and overwhelmed are now communicating, regulating emotions, and engaging with the world.

Monthly gifts of $50, $100, or $250 help us continue delivering this life-changing care, regardless of a family's financial situation. Your support powers programs like Transition to Work, our sensory garden, and community-based adult services. Help turn barriers into breakthroughs—one Firefly at a time.
